At ordinary temperatures and pressures, five of the elements, hydrogen, oxygen, nitrogen, fluorine, and chlorine, are gases; mercury and bromine are liquids; while all the rest, including all metals excepting mercury, are solids. All the solids except carbon have been liquefied at various temperatures. Few elements, except the more common metals and oxygen and nitrogen, are extensively used or found in an uncombined state; they usually occur in various combinations, which are divided into three classes: acids, bases, and salts. 2568. An acid may be defined as a compound containing hydrogen, which hydrogen may be replaced by a metal when presented to it in the form of an oxide or hydrate. The combination of oxygen with...
